Risks in trading – International Cyber Security

As businesses anywhere start thinking about trading internationally, they will engage with unfamiliar cultures, laws, languages and customs. Who is trustworthy, what are the do's and don'ts and what should businesses be doing to ensure that their cyber security measures are adequate? Are there countries where the cyber security threat is greater than others, or is the threat landscape broadly similar in a digitally connected world? With international banking the backbone of international trade, what can be expected of different banking regimes and will their thinking about online security in the UK stand them in good stead internationally? These and other questions are discussed with some Cyber Security professionals with experience in different cultures and how the risks translate.

Roger Mackrill

Following an extensive career in automotive, aerospace, nuclear power engineering and senior management in US, UK, Europe, India and China, Roger is the director and founder of Sabre UK Ltd.
